We've been pretty content on this blog to try to convince you of the benefits of using SRAM products. But our latest effort is a bit more traditional. We knew that the folks at Kona Cycling needed some motivation for a new component they're currently developing. So we took a stroll to the surf side of town. As you'll see from the video below, we've got a feeling that Kona Cycling will be a very happy company come this coming spring.

Q: Should I consider using Xamarin Forms Authentication for an app that lives on Azure App Services? I'm currently looking at whether to use Xamarin Forms Authentication for an app that lives entirely on the Azure App Services. The app does use Azure Active Directory for the login process and might need to use email addresses of users as unique identifiers, in order to identify users in the app. But it would be nice if the users could just use a Microsoft account to login and have those identities automatically resolved back to the username and some form of security token for later use in the app. So I'm wondering if XF is the right way to go about it, or if there's something else I should be considering. Thanks for any advice.

A: You can keep your app on Azure App Services and use XF

Authentication for authentication.

Regarding to "Using email addresses of users as unique identifiers" you can use UserName that are unique for every user, and provide the same value for all the users. Just setup Azure Active Directory and use AD Graph API to find the user's details. Q: Sort files by content of another file Im trying to create a function that does the following: a) read the input (Content of file1) into an array b) create a second array with the content of file2 c) sort the first array by the first values and then the second array based on the second values and so on. Example: file1.txt

a b c d file2.txt aa bb cc dd sort-by-first.txt a bb cc dd sort-by-second.txt aa c b d So the first array would be: [a, bb, cc, dd] and the second [aa, c, b, d] 570a42141b
