Here, EA SPORTS product and FIFA technical director Matt Bilbey explains: “We think that FIFA players enjoy a more realistic game experience and that we should all feel that way. Using this technology, we are able to capture and pass on the authentic movements of our 22 real-life players and use this information to give you, the player, complete control over the ball’s trajectory and movement as well as the exact ability to feel that they are actually playing that football match. We have brought it to the next level.” “Putting together all of the elements that have been developed over the past four years has allowed us to utilize the technology and finally begin to answer the question we all thought about when we first started working on this project: ‘How can we bring to life this idea that represents a football match in the game’s engine and give the fans the feeling of how they would play it?’” “Possibly the most significant aspect of HyperMotion Technology is how it adds a level of control to how the ball reacts during a football match. The depth and speed of the passing, the weight of the pass, the movement and trajectory of the ball in the air and all of these small things are now controlled by the player themselves, without the use of the controller. We have been working on this technology since 2010 and during that time we have been thinking about how we can take player interaction to the next level. One of the major breakthroughs in how we have been able to achieve this is with ball movement and specifically how that movement adapts according to the player’s actions.” “FIFA 22 continues to deliver a new-for-FIFA experience and this technology, alongside some key refinements, gives us the opportunity to deliver an authentic football match experience to players.” HyperMotion Technology By continuously generating and updating the data on player movement during a match, the method to pass on movement is better conveyed and better interpreted. This ‘cloud’ of data is then captured and applied as a back-end physics engine, creating a more realistic and intuitive passing experience. As the new technology pushes the control of all aspects of the ball’s behaviour to the player, the intricacies of each individual on-field move are optimized and mirrored by the game. The results are active, intelligent and reactive ball physics that deliver authentic and fluid ball control during gameplay. Of course
