===== !Response of scarring agent to a single dose of hyaluronidase.When injected, hyaluronidase degrades the large (100--150 million dalton) hyaluronic acid proteoglycan-rich basal matrix of scar and normal dermis to increase the concentration of free hyaluronan, in both the upper dermis and the lower dermis. Hyaluronan, in turn, recruits fibroblasts that play a crucial role in wound healing, since they are induced to produce the synthesize extracellular matrix molecules necessary for maintaining a dynamic dermal architecture and vascular response. In the absence of this hyaluronan-fibroblast interaction, the repair process is disturbed and the result is a permanent scar of inappropriate connective tissue architecture. Note that hyaluronidase increases the concentration of hyaluronan, both in the upper dermis and the lower dermis.](ar1223-1){#F1} !Degradation of hyaluronan to increase its concentration in the upper dermis is necessary for proper wound healing.Hyaluronidase fails to induce vascular proliferation to form blood vessels in the upper dermis; these blood vessels have been shown to be essential for epidermal closure and wound healing \[[@B6]\]. In addition, hyaluronidase also fails to stimulate synthesis of the basement membrane component laminin in the upper dermis, but does have this effect in the lower dermis. These two defects in the healing response to injury explain why scars that form following injury (in the presence of hyaluronidase) are permanent because they fail to develop an epithelial closure, and are unable to adequately develop a vascular basement membrane.](ar1223-2){#F2} Q: Who are the "rightful citizens of the United States"? Risk factors for aseptic loosening after proximal femoral replacement: a retrospective cohort study. We retrospectively analyzed the factors associated with loosening of long-stemmed femoral components after total hip arthroplasty (THA) in 572 cases in the context of a total of 7176 primary THAs performed at a single institution. We analyzed these factors by multivariate analyses. Risk factors for loosening were female sex (OR 1.45, 95% CI 1.03 to 2.06), implant revision, infection (OR 2.45, 95% CI 1.78 to 3.39), and implant malposition (OR 2.03, 95% CI 1.49 to 2.76). The number of cemented acetabular components did not influence the risk. However, a higher risk of loosening was associated with gluteus medius arthrosis (OR 2.09, 95% CI 1.31 to 3.32) and gluteus maximus arthrosis (OR 2.47, 95% CI 1.30 to 4.70). Fixation time and stem design did not affect the risk of loosening. The risk of loosening was not influenced by the use of hydroxyapatite (HA) or an HA coating on the inner surface of the acetabular component. The risk of loosening was higher after stems that were at least 25 mm shorter than the femoral component (OR 1.51, 95% CI 1.12 to 2.04). Although the risk of loosening increased in patients who did not receive treatment for their arthrosis, the difference was not statistically significant. Malpositioning of the femoral component was a significant risk factor for loosening. In patients who required a stem that was 25 mm shorter than the femoral component, loosening was more likely. The risk of loosening was not influenced by the use of HA coating. I want to congratulate the authors of the opinion of the European Court of Human Rights in the case involving Yfanturi Frantzis and Petra Iliova. The authors have assessed the facts in a balanced way and have considered the principle of proportionality: the prohibition on interference with the home and the family. They were also sensitive to the fact that more comprehensive measures would not have been proportionate. In certain cases, such as in the case of the detention of the family of Nikos Michaloliakos, the court has always adopted a prohibition
