Use of a gas-generating reagent to increase the fraction of the active form of the glutathione transferase in human erythrocytes. The distribution of active glutathione transferase between cytosol and membrane is important in determining the susceptibility of cells to oxidative stress. In the current study, it was determined whether the gas-generating reagent, azide, which causes cell swelling, would increase the percentage of the active glutathione transferase in human erythrocytes. Glutathione transferase is a heme-containing enzyme whose activity increases in parallel with cell volume. The percentage of enzyme distributed to the membrane decreased as the degree of cell swelling increased, i.e., as the percentage of volume occupied by intracellular protein decreased. Addition of azide to packed human erythrocytes caused cell swelling. Preincubation of cells with azide increased the percentage of membrane-bound glutathione transferase. Thus, the effect of azide to increase glutathione transferase activity may be in part due to increasing membrane volume.Q: how to detect a device or mobile that logs into a website using Capybara? Comparison of colon cancer risk by geographic location among women and men in the Prostate, Lung, Colorectal, and Ovarian (PLCO) Cancer Screening Trial. Despite significant reductions in overall colorectal cancer incidence in the United States over the past several decades, substantial geographic variability has been documented. Previous studies have shown that colon cancer risk may vary depending on the geographic region. However, these analyses have included only women. To assess whether regional differences in colon cancer risk exist among men and women and whether these differences vary by race, age, and body mass index (BMI). Cohort study, conducted within the Prostate, Lung, Colorectal and Ovarian (PLCO) Cancer Screening Trial. The trial is a randomized controlled trial designed to compare the effectiveness of biennial fecal occult blood testing and annual flexible sigmoidoscopy for the early detection of colorectal cancer. In this analysis, we compared the rate of advanced colon cancer (Dukes' stage C or D) incidence among participants in the first round of screening (randomized to the sigmoidoscopy arm) with those randomized to the control arm. The rate of advanced colon cancer incidence was 3.8% among men from the screening arm and 3.3% in the control arm. Among women, the incidence of advanced colon cancer was 4.2% in the screening arm and 2.4% in the control arm. Of the 46,233 women included in the study, the control arm and screening arm had a similar incidence of advanced colon cancer among whites, African Americans, and Asians. However, among whites, screening decreased the incidence of advanced colon cancer by 42%, from 5.7% to 3.1%, compared with the control arm (p
