Q: How can I set my server's IP address? I am currently connected to a WiFi router on my home network. I would like to be able to access my server, which is on my LAN, from any internet connection at home. How do I set up my router so that the router's IP address doesn't match the LAN IP address of my home server? I tried to connect my cell phone to the router, but the router's internet router port wasn't open.

A: By default, ports 80 and 443 are forwarded, i.e. your computer's router will forward traffic to the LAN from the "outside", so you can just make sure that either of these ports are not blocked by your firewall (if you have one) If you want to block/port-forward traffic to your server completely, you can't use port 80 or 443 because those are the standard ports for http and https traffic. This generally is only possible on dedicated servers, where you can define which ports you want to listen to. That said, I'm guessing you want to forward only http or https traffic to port 80 or 443. Depending on your setup, this could be achieved with iptables or ufw - these are the two most common ways of firewall management. With iptables you'd fire up a ruleset that looks something like this (I've no idea which ports your internet provider forwarded): iptables -t nat -A PREROUTING -i wlan0 -p tcp --dport 80 -j DNAT --to 192.168.1.100:80 iptables -t nat -A PREROUTING -i wlan0 -p tcp --dport 443 -j DNAT --to 192.168.1.100:443 (note that these rules won't fire up until you restart the firewall) Similarly, ufw would allow you to create a firewall rule to do so, for example: ufw -t nat -A PREROUTING -i wlan0 -p tcp --dport 80 -j D 6d1f23a050
