Both result in the same sql, only trim is faster when i want to execute my query. trim(?) returns a varchar(767) and alltrim(?) converts it to VARCHAR(4000) which is faster. SQL query with alltrim() SELECT * FROM `schema.`tablename` WHERE `alltrim(`colA`) ='somevalue' SQL query with trim() SELECT * FROM `schema.`tablename` WHERE `trim(`colA`) ='somevalue' A: As you said, they will be the same, but alltrim is not faster. I would say that trim is a bit safer. As alltrim will remove all the delimiters as well, also after all. A: In 10g, I believe both statements are equivalent. They have identical results and performance. In prior versions of 10g, trim could remove delimiters, alltrim couldn't. I don't know which is faster in earlier versions. That part doesn't matter. At the end of the day, your queries are equivalent and the performance difference is non-existent. Dispersion Forces. The present chapter focuses on the main features of the van der Waals (dispersion) interaction in real space and the potential regions in the corresponding quantum mechanical and classical models. First, the purely classical approach is described and compared with the corresponding exact quantum mechanical results. Second, two types of classical models, the Monte Carlo and the Lennard-Jones approaches, are briefly analyzed by highlighting their numerical convenience and the regions of validity in the parameter space. Third, some current limb ischaemia. Cohort study. Our aim was to evaluate and report the experiences of a regional referral and research centre for critical limb ischaemia (CLI). We retrospectively reviewed patient case-notes from 1 January 2000 to 31 December 2011. We included all patients referred to our centre for CLI with critical limb ischaemia and performed a disease-specific, validated questionnaire on the demographic information, investigations performed and outcomes of treatment. We defined CLI as Rutherford-Becker class 4 or 5, amputation or above knee amputation levels. A total of 425 patients were referred for CLI with 292 being suitable for follow-up. One hundred and seventy-five patients underwent infra-inguinal bypass surgery, and 45 patients were considered unsuitable for surgery. The remaining 182 patients were managed conservatively. At review, a total of 97 patients (51.6%) were considered to have achieved a technically successful revascularisation. The median follow-up period of the entire cohort was 24 months. The median survival was 117 months for the entire cohort. The location of the inflow was above or below the knee in 124 patients (69%). There were no significant demographic differences between patients considered to have and not to have achieved a successful inflow. Patients at high risk of death were those with major comorbidity (PWilly: The Excluded Again Willy: 6d1f23a050
