The CEO of Volkswagen and Chevrolet said the German automaker is considering investing $500 million (approximately $620 million) in Lyft to build a self-driving car unit that can compete with Google or Uber. M. Mueller said he expects that this investment could be the start of a joint venture that would create a line of autonomous vehicles produced for a ride-hailing business such as Uber. Mueller said the project could include partnerships with suppliers that produce essential components such as sensors and connectivity systems. The CEO said the companies planning to invest in this project will include the potential investors General Motors, Ford, and Daimler. Daimler AG said it would cooperate with the European Commission on the creation of a platform that would allow carmakers across the 28-nation bloc to exchange data on the safety of new and existing vehicles. This is part of a plan by the Commission to eliminate barriers in the auto industry, which they see as a critical part of the single market and the integration of digital services in the car. The Securities and Exchange Commission alleges that Tesla CEO Elon Musk has violated his settlement agreement with the financial regulator by inflating vehicle production figures in a Twitter tweet. The SEC petitioned U.S. District Court in Manhattan to cite the executive for contempt of court. It seems unlikely that the court will remove Musk from Tesla's management. He has acknowledged a lack of respect for the SEC, which he last year called the Shortseller Enrichment Commission.
