With the new update of the Adobe Photoshop, you will be able to take advantage of the new features even more. You can use some of them immediately, while others, especially the new ones, will require a tiny bit of training. The new features will also require fewer skills, be easier to use, and faster the way you work. As expected, I have to point out that the new camera-specific feature is somewhat unreliable, though I do admire the idea of working on images right after you've shot them. However, random crashes are hardly new to Photoshop, since Adobe has been offering it for decades. The new version is not perfect, though, when it comes to camera-specific features. This may be due to the fact that the new features are still under "beta" development and obviously have a ways to go. That said, my previous complaint with this update is still relevant. There are few, if any, settings to help users interpret and apply camera profiles. Automatic white balance and other functions have a tendency to be incorrect due to the fact that there are no settings that distinguish between RAW and JPEG images. You may also be a little frustrated with the features limiting you to a RAW workflow. Lightroom still doesn't have features such as Spot Removal or even the Image > Annotate > Marker features that are found in Adobe Camera RAW. But the point of Lightroom is to work with raw images without all of these processing options. This may be something that Adobe will adopt over time, but when it first launched, the software could be frustrating because of that major limitation.

Photoshop's editing tools are incredibly powerful, but they are also quite cumbersome to use. You can load a feature set up to do a wide variety of tasks, but it's a lot of keystrokes to get that one shot just right. Photoshop is significantly more portable than Photoshop Elements, and the difference in size and speed has actually been worth it for a lot of users. Elements is extremely easy to just 'plug and play' with your existing images, but if you didn't then the non-existent Corel graphics workflows always seemed a bit out-of-date and unmaintained. Adobe Photoshop has always been a step behind the curve of real-time 3D rendering and a poor fit for consumer use. This is especially obvious with its lack of support for GPU-based GPU artists. Unfortunately, Adobe has decided to quit on GPU acceleration entirely in favor of pushing users toward existing in-browser solutions that don't currently deliver the speed and quality that GPU users need.

Although Photoshop may be an extremely powerful and complex tool you may need to take a step back and think about what heavy functionality you actually need. Whether you use Photoshop for web design or just for your creative workflow, it could be that there are other editing tools out there that can do what you want without you having to invest in repeat time in learning exactly how Photoshop does it.
